If we are still alive today, we should be thankful to our almighty God for all the good things and magnificent creation. Regarding the current situation, there are numerous local and worldwide issues that cause us concern. Money laundering, human trafficking, a severe economic crisis, extreme climate change, flood disasters, and the threat of terrorism are all issues that must be addressed.

All of these problems have a big effect on politics, the economy, society, and security at the national, regional, and international levels. This September's issue is exceptional for our team since it is the first time in our journal's history that intriguing topics are included in a special section. HOT AND CONTROVERSIAL!!!! Fighter or Terrorist??? That's the essence of article by Sadri (page 11-23). While this may be a touchy subject for some, this research is primarily concerned with how effectively organisations can curb radicalism. Even though it was anticipated that the COVID-19 pandemic would exacerbate the effects of terrorism in some locations, it appears that the pandemic has had a negligible effect on terrorism in 2020 and 2021.

To avoid this, people and institutions need to work together on solutions to systemic, cross-sectoral problems, including poor mental health, disillusionment with government, and unemployment. In order to combat the rising feelings of anger and disillusionment among people, it would be beneficial to adopt creative program that attempt to strengthen the capabilities for the sake of the future. Also, there are several articles on tourist management that will shed light on the significance of the tourism business to a country's GDP and standard of living.

Let's take some time to read this month's edition and have fun doing it. The next edition of the publication will feature work from me and my team that is both timely and engaging.
